Three-tiered Architecture

When developing a backend application (server application), we typically deal with 3 layers:

- Controller layer: This is the layer that the Javalin framework delegates to (this is our own code)

- Service layer: This is the layer responsible for taking the information that was received by the Controller layer to perform additional business logic

- Data access layer (DAO layer): This is the layer responsible for interfacing with a database